

Apparently is no section for my comments on "airline passengers being permitted to use cell phones during flights in the future"; therefore, I am submitting my comments in the "broadband . . ." section.

My comments: Allowing passengers to create more unnecessarily loud and irritating noise by chattering away on their cell phones during flights is a highly ill-conceived idea, apparently considered only to benefit cell phone companies and lobbyists because no rational thinking traveler wants to be subjected to this irritating and mind-numbing cacophony in the sky where one cannot easily escape the unbearable and uninvited noises.

I agree with many others who have stated that this "talking privilege" is highly unnecessary and should not be implemented, as most if not all airline travelers seek peaceful, considerate and relaxing trips, not "entertainment" by rude, talkative persons trying to impress the rest of us with their conversations, deals and knowledge.

I predict that air travel will decrease if cell phone users are allowed in-flight usage of the airwave, because the flights will be full of noisy individuals who cannot hear over the din of their own voices and their phone cohorts, creating very unpleasant, unproductive and stressful trips.